WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

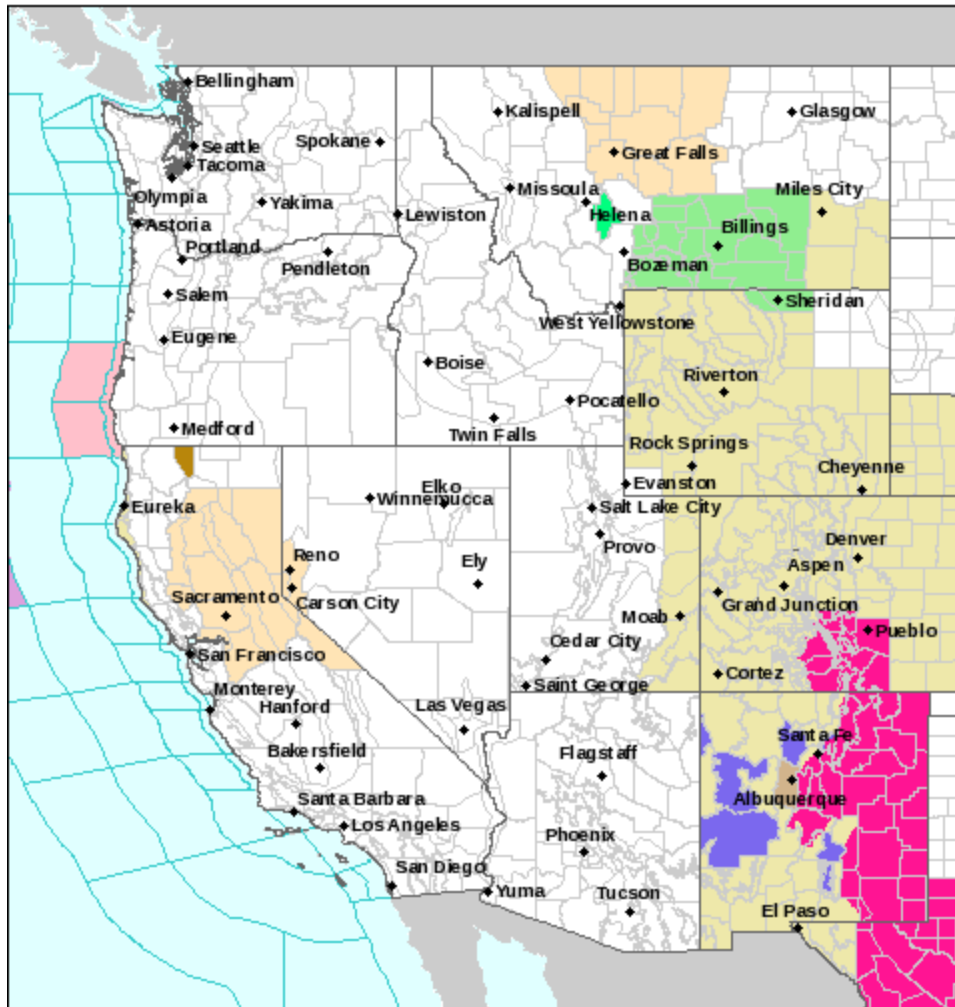

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

Skies will clear out tonight but once again and high pressure will build in briefly on Sunday. Stratus and fog is possible along the coast once again. Frost is a possibility Sunday morning in the interior areas, but there may be too much moisture around. Models are in good agreement that Sunday will see dry weather. Monday the next storm system starts to move into the area. Current model runs have slowed this system by several hours. During the day the warm front moves through bringing some potential for some rain or drizzle in most areas, with the heavies rain in the evening. Humboldt Bay area may stay dry due to some downsloping with increasing southerly winds through day. Gusts to 50 mph are possible over portions of the region mountains and ridges.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

A warm and moist Pacific storm system will affect the region this weekend. Light to moderate rain is expected to affect the region today and tonight. Brief heavy rain is possible for south facing foothills and mountains, when peak rainfall rates between 0.20 and 0.40 inches per hour will be likely. On Sunday, the rainfall is expected to turn to scattered showers, mainly in the morning hours. Storm total rainfall is generally expected to range between 0.50 and 1.50 inches across most coastal and valley areas, with 1.00 to 3.00 inch accumulations possible across south and southwest facing foothills and mountains. Potential impacts with this storm system include urban and small stream flooding as well as minor mud and debris flows in recent burn areas, including the Thomas Fire burn scar.
